DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Jewelers' Building with exterior walls of brick, terra cotta, and iron has five stories above a basement. Its facade is divided into a wide center bay between two smaller end bays. The windows in the central bay are further sub-divided by cast iron mullions into three openings on the second to fourth floors, and into six on the fifth floor. The masonry portion is designed in a highly polychromatic red brick, terra cotta, and stone. The Jewelers' Building has a flat roof which slopes slightly. An ornamental parapet completes the design of the facade. The building has a frontage of approximately 60 feet on Wabash Avenue and a depth of 160 feet.

The major part of the ornament is concentrated under the arch of the central bay, and at the corners of the building. Cast iron ornament originally graced piers, now removed, on the first floor. The architectural decoration comes from Sullivan's first period of ornament (1873-1890), phase two (1880-1883). For the most part, the ornament consists of stylized plant forms that are carefully and rigidly delineated. The motifs do not overlap and are seen against a smooth ground.

On the interior, the columns bear no relationship to the facade. The beams run north and south across the building, while the arches are oriented along the east and west transverse axis. There has been considerable remodeling on the interior. The exterior on the ground floor has been completely remodeled.

HISTORY

The building at 134 Wabash (new number 15-19 South Wabash) was designed in 1881 by Adler & Sullivan. It was one of four buildings this firm designed for Martin Ryerson, an early Chicago businessman and real estate investor. Shortly after completion, the building was rented by Samuel A. Maxwell Company, a stationary store. According to Martin A. Ryerson, son of the original owner, the building was not named when finished. Therefore, it must have been at some later time that it acquired the name Jewelers' Building. The building cost $90,260 in 1881-82.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Jewelers' Building is one of five structures (plus one remodeling soon) to be demolished) still standing in Chicago's Loop designed by the internationally famous early modern architects, Louis Sullivan and Dankmar Adler. As the only remaining commercial building by that firm from the early 1880's, the Jewelers' is especially significant. In no other building is the polychromatic character of the firms' work so clearly revealed. The Jewelers' Building is also very important because of the large quantity of very early ornament by Sullivan still to be seen on its facade.
